

Marks on British sterling silver and gold thimbles

Compulsory hallmarking of British silver thimbles came into effect in 1884 when all silver over a certain weight had to be assayed for the purity of the silver used. Before this time it was optional to mark them, as thimbles weighed less than the required amount for assaying. Thimbles have to be 925 of 1000 parts silver (i.e. .925) to have a hallmark applied. The Lion passant is the hallmark symbol used to indicate this. For Dublin, the Lion passant is replaced with Hibernia.

When the silver is purer than sterling silver i.e. 950 of 1000 parts silver, the Britannia mark is used.

There is then a symbol for the town where the assay office is located: an anchor for Birmingham - three wheat sheaves for Chester (closed in 1962) – a leopard's face for London – a castle for Edinburgh – white rose of York for Sheffield. There are now only four assay offices operating in the UK.

The last mark in a hallmark, is an alphabetic symbol which denotes the year the item was assayed.

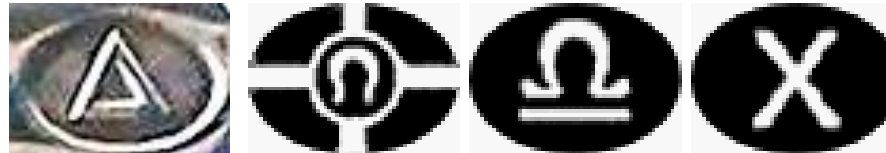

Look out for additional special marks on thimbles.

1. 1953 Coronation
2. 1977 Silver Jubilee - with two examples off thimbles
3. 2000 millennium mark
4. 2002 Golden Jubilee
5. 2012 Diamond Jubilee

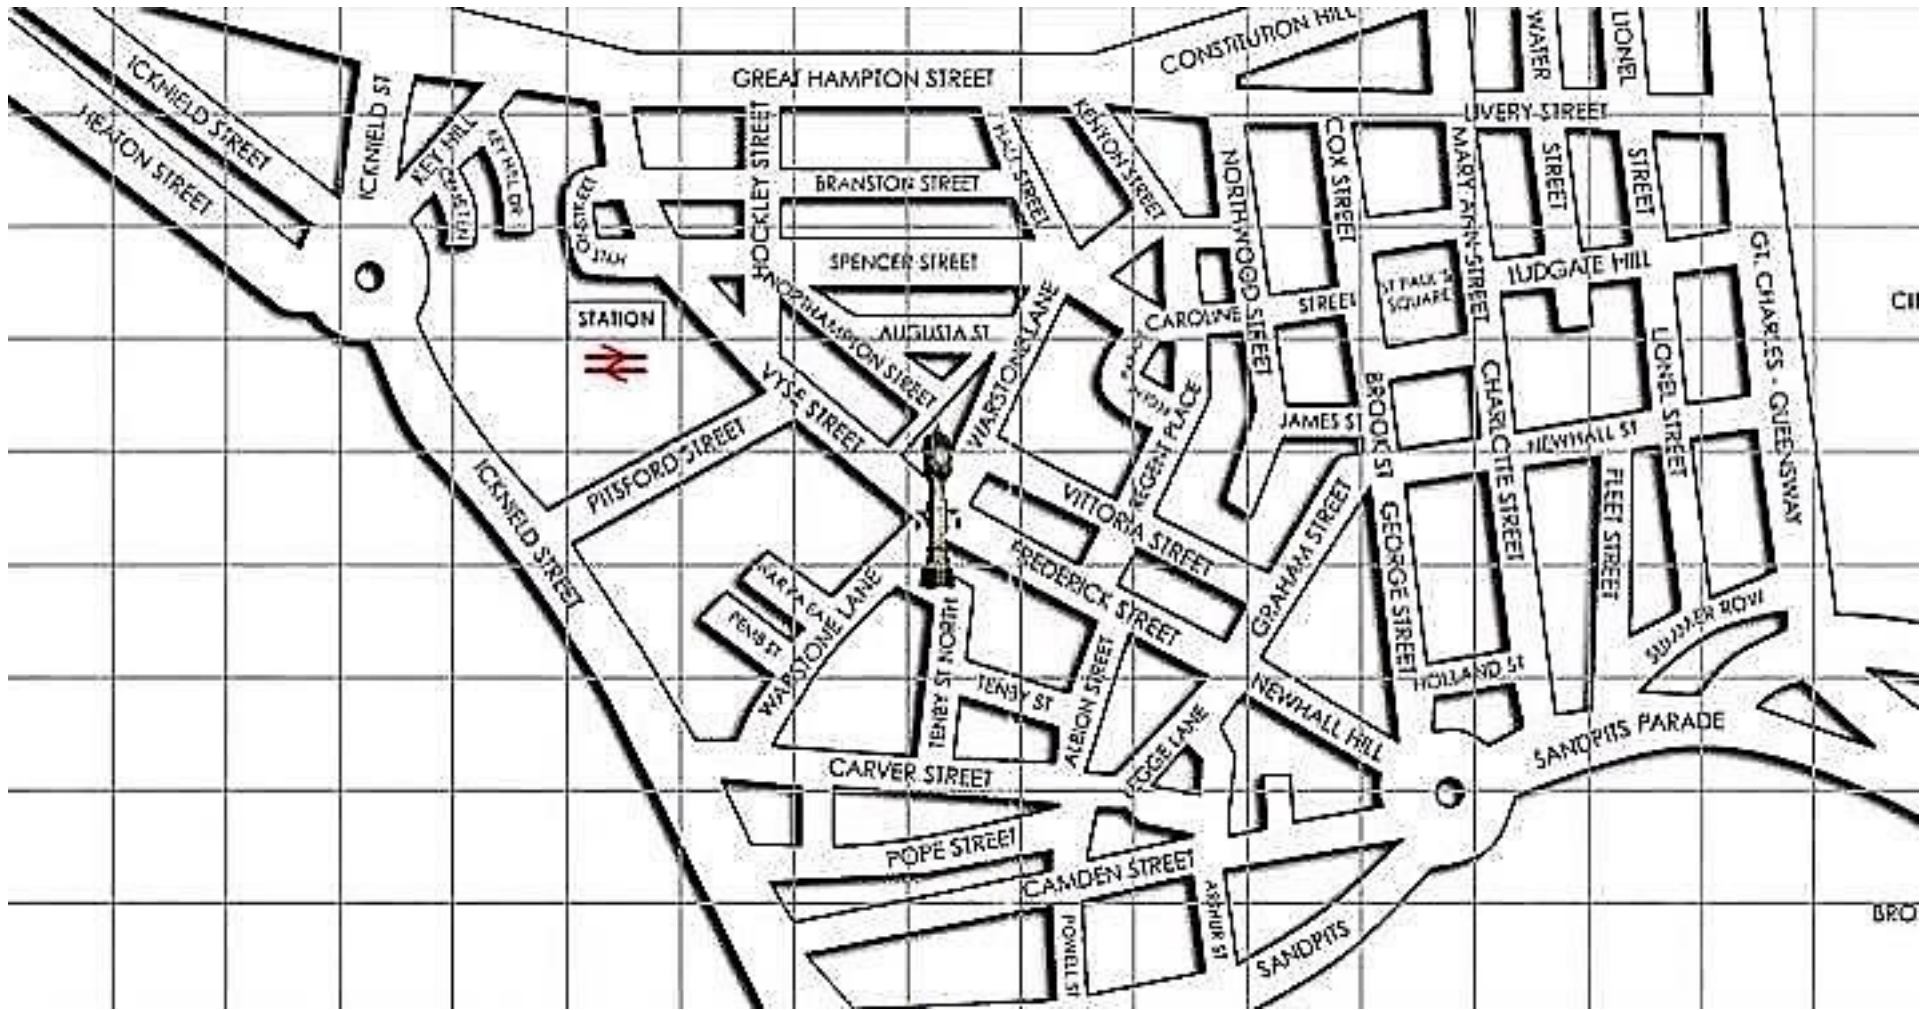

In addition to all these marks, in the case of thimbles, there is an additional mark: the maker's mark (the subject of this page) and the size of the thimble. This size mark is not part of the hallmark, technically speaking.

Between 1904 and 1998 the Assay Offices introduced a mark to indicate that the sterling silver item was foreign-made but assayed in Britain. There are no other Assay Office marks, tho there may be a date letter of manufacture.

about the listing

The following listing is for "maker's" (now termed sponsor's) marks found on British silver thimbles, arranged alphabetically by the maker's mark and not by the surname. It is far from complete. In the 1980s Edwin Holmes noted there were over 1000 silversmiths in Birmingham alone and felt it would be a never-ending task to list the ones who had thimbles with their marks. Only a fraction would have produced silver thimbles and current thinking in 2007 is that the bulk of this listing are the names of sponsors who had thimbles produced with their marks, but they did not actually make the thimbles.

487 marks are listed here, with quite a few maker's names still to be identified or show an example of their mark.

With the closure of the last Victorian thimble maker (Ray Coggle of JS&S) in April 2005, it is gratifying to note the growing number of hallmarks for thimble makers at the end of the 20th century and even into the 21st century. These are the antiques of the future!

Marks

I have ignored punctuation, as without seeing each thimble with its mark, this could never be accurate. There is no spacing between initials to make the maker's mark as compact as possible, but some have a slight spacing that is not possible to reproduce here, but the photo of the mark where available, will show this more clearly.

I have included variations or additions to names, listing the silversmith under the most commonly found maker's mark. These marks are usually found in a lozenge on the rim of the thimble and again these vary from maker to maker. Some marks will have been stamped directly onto the band, not in a lozenge; or into the indentations which makes identification more difficult.

In Britain during World War I 350,000 to 400,000 silver thimbles were donated for a good cause = melting them down, the thimbles provided approximately £37.000 for the fund-raising drive for hospital development. Imagine how our modern records would have been enhanced if these thimbles had been recorded.

The four most prolific English silver thimble makers were Charles Horner, James Swann, James Fenton, and Henry Griffith.

Silversmith & location

The name is the most difficult to complete; the location is the principal office, factory, or shop of the silversmith.

Assay office

This lists the assay office/s used by the silversmith, taken from examples found on thimbles. Most of the original lists, compiled by thimble collectors since the 1980s, separate the Chester and Birmingham silversmiths by assay office, but the thimble makers tended to use the one most convenient at the time. They had to be registered at both assay offices, to use the specific assay office mark.

In 2015, the Sheffield Assay Office opened a sub-branch in Malpensa Italy, and items assayed in Italy will bear the identical hallmark for Sheffield (rose). In 2016 the Birmingham Assay Office followed suit and they opened a sub-branch in Mumbai India. The Birmingham anchor will appear on sterling silver items assayed in Mumbai.

Hallmark year

These are actual hallmark years as found on thimbles. I have not included dates on thimbles for Horner, Fenton, Griffith or James Swann as they are too numerous.

Registration date

Often, we only have a registration date from an assay office to guide us; or dates of operation; or dates they lived. These may help in dating a thimble when there is an indistinct hallmark or two possible dates.

Notes

I have included any additional information here that can be of use including where we know who ACTUALLY made the thimbles. Occasionally I will include a thimble photo here for illustrative purposes.
